Not illustrated. 1876 Excerpt: . . . last he thought it was time to proceed, and finding the little iron gate closed he cleverly ran up it, avoiding the spikes, and down on the other side. There he found plenty of cedar and oak-trees, and thought starvation was certainly an impossibility. He enjoyed himself for a considerable time, nibbling first at one and then at another, running up and down the trees to his hearts content, till he had nearly reached the little summer-house, when a short yelping bark sent a thrill of terror through his plucky little heart, as a rough shaggy terrier emerged from a large rabbit-hole close by, half covered with mud, and licking his lips, as though he had been feasting on some of its unlucky inhabitants. He did not, however, seem to have satisfied either his hunger or his love of hunting, for catching sight of the trembling little squirrel, he made a bound towards him, and, as Brownie was much too terrified this time to know what he was doing, chased him for a considerable distance through the wood, before he had the sense to spring into a tree, and place himself in safety. Even then the dog kept jumping and barkng. round the tree in the maddest way, so that poor Brownie, who had never seen one before, and supposed that dogs could at least climb like cats, gave himself up for lost. Indeed, I do not know whether he might not have let go his...
