Not illustrated. 1898 Excerpt: .how, when Pitt proposed his new treaty of commerce with France--one of the brightest streaks of light in the dismal chaos of politics that characterizes George III. s reign--one member of Parliament expressed a fear lest such a ra /proclzemen! should have a pernicious influence upon the character of the English; as though that celestial race might lose something of its angelic quality by too close a contact with the French--a people everyway as noble, everyway as brave, and with a record as regards achievements in science and letters in all respects as great as that of the English. Not less surprising is it to find another statesman reproaching the author of the measure with the fact that he had risen to a higher view than his father, the elder Pitt, in that he had ceased to regard the French as the natural and hereditary enemies...
